NEWS | POSTED MARCH 7, 2022

Social Science Advocacy Day

Posted on behalf of Consortium of Social Science Associations (COSSA).

Join COSSA on March 29, 2022 to be part of the only annual, coordinated advocacy day in support of all of the social and behavioral sciences. Social Science Advocacy Day brings together social scientists and other science advocates from across the country to engage with policymakers. For the third year in a row, COSSA's Advocacy Day will be conducted virtually, giving participants the ability to safely and conveniently engage with their elected officials from home.

Attendees will be teamed up with other social scientists from their state to participate in a day of virtual meetings with House and Senate offices to share with them why federal support for social and behavioral science research is so important. COSSA will provide attendees with multiple live and on-demand training opportunities and logistical support (including scheduling meetings with Congressional offices and providing an on-call expert to answer your day-of policy questions), as well as polished, up-to-date materials to help you communicate your message to policymakers. Each team will also have the option of partnering with an experienced government relations professional who can guide you through your meetings with members of Congress and their staff.

Watch the COSSA website for the latest information as Advocacy Day planning continues over the next several weeks.

This event is open only to individuals affiliated with a COSSA member organization. If you are a member of or employed by one of COSSA’s organizations, you are eligible to participate. You can check your organization/institution's membership status here. Not a member? Click here to learn more about how your organization can join COSSA and take advantage of our members-only opportunities.

Learn more